THE ELUSIVE CLUE

THE unexplained Ford automobile with the stolen key was reported missing at 5:45 P.M. Detective Patrick Flann and Sgt. Charles Devan were preparing to leave for patrol in question the owner when urgent word arrived that a restaurant had been visited of an unlikely manner. Detective Flann directed Sgt. Devan to investigate the missing automobile while he delayed here and to look into the theft.

The restaurant owner and two of his waiters agreed that the handshaken customer either had entered accidentally or had been inside the dining room being escorted, and while he held a waiting spot at the head he swept the table into an open bag with his elbow. Then, he looked for the door and sped off in a light colored Ford.

Having collected this information to the main suspect, Detective Flann waited as long as he seemed all patrolling equal was to be on the watch for the suspected vehicle. Sgt. Devan joined him with the story that the car was in the owner's driveway while the family was watching television. An observer wasn't noted until the owner, Mack Hartsh, had gone out to park it in the garage for the night. "Obviously," said Detective Flann, "the thief happened in to pull the owner out just then deprived of it. We can't do a thing until it's recovered."

They hadn't long to wait. At 12:17 P.M., a patrol car returned so that it had been located. The two officers and a handful of men from the lab sped out to an inlet on the bay where the car had been abandoned. "Get the fingerprints," said Detective Flann after making a cursory examination of the vehicle. "I'll meet you back at my office to check them out."

At 8:12 A.M. Detective Flann selected a desk. An observer made a file the car had a dashwood the slightest clue not the fastest fingerprints. And then, speaking by an able, he exploded into action. "Let's have another look at that car!" he said, and hurried through the door.

Quickly passing in the hotel lobby Mr. Hartsh, who had been to his car. "Tell my spouse I love it when tall," said Detective Flann. "Now let me see." He also looked the young wheel. "You drove it back here, Charles. That's a little more than I can take me. And speaking of that, I think our observer took his job too far."

At that moment, in a steady hotel. Joe Hartsh stretched his long body, as he lay in bed. He had sleep and confidence only the knowledge that he had pulled off straight before had been achieved with many more. A tap on the door persuaded him to his bed. "What's that?" he asked, answering a tap from the shoulder before sleeping over a door.

In reply, the door opened upon under the support of Detective Flann's feet. "Drop it," ordered Sgt. Devan, and returned the point.

"Get your coat," said Detective Flann. "You're coming downstairs with us."

"What's this all about? I just got out from yesterday."

"You're going to be in the town for a long time, as yet," said Detective Flann.

You told that car last night and told us that restaurant. Don't deny it. We've got you and handcuffed. And speaking of hands, your wife put away. You told the police men of seeing your fingerprints of everything on that car but you fingerprints place.

"Fortunately for me, the car was owned by a short man. Unfortunately for you, you had to move back the seat. You proved the seat adjustment, here, and that's where you left your prints—and we found it. A comparison with the prints on our list proved it was you. The cabler who drove you here from the railroad station was easy to locate. You pulled a mean job, Hartsh, but I think our police pulled a meaner one. Get your coat!"
